IT IS THE WHITE MAN'S CAPITAL.

There is, comparatively speaking, an immense amount of capital invested in this little country—in business, buildings, sugar plantations, sugar machinery, rice plantations, etc. Probably no country of similar area and population surpasses it in this particular. The great bulk of this capital is owned by the white man—more than the casual visitor or superficial observer generally supposes. Take away the white man's portion of the capital invested, and the balance remaining to the native Hawaiian and the oriental races will be small indeed. Although the rice plantations are almost entirely operated by Chinamen and nominally owned by them, it is the white man's capital that stands behind them and keeps them going. The muscle and industry of the Celestial have converted thousands of acres of swamps into fields of grain, but muscle and industry could have effected comparatively little without the support of the white foreigner's capital. The same prop is placed beneath most of those fine brick structures being erected on the site of the late great fire. A large amount of money is being expended by Chinamen in the restoration of what the fire destroyed, but they have to rely largely upon the white man for it. If dependent solely on their own means, the restoration process would be an extremely slow one. Their trade operations are also chiefly fed from the same source. In short, the business, the agriculture, the permanent improvements, and almost everything of the country requiring money, are largely—very largely, almost entirely—dependent on the white man's capital. This is an assertion easily verified by anyone caring to take the trouble of investigation. And yet there are people here stupid enough to think, or say, that the country could get on swimmingly without the white man and his coin. It can't be done.

Present Condition of the Hawaiian.

The pastor, Rev. J. A. Cruzan, presided at the Fort Street Church, monthly concert last night. The main feature of the occasion was a paper by Chief Justice Judd, on the present condition of the Hawaiian. The paper, although not professing to deal exhaustively with the subject, has the merit of coming from one whose thorough knowledge of the Hawaiian—his language, his habits of thought and life, his entire character—constitutes him an authority. The Hawaiian's moral and religious nature was the particular phase of the question dwelt upon. He (the Hawaiian) is naturally disposed to believe in the supernatural, and finds no difficulty in subscribing to the miracles of the Scriptures. He never troubles himself about Renan, Strauss or Spencer. The writer had never known a Hawaiian to be a professed infidel. The Hawaiian is greatly interested in Sunday School exhibitions, but has little idea of the importance of his moral life being consistent with his religious professions. He is strongly averse to incurring enmity for the sake of principle. He is characterized by hospitality and a readiness to forgive. The most hardened criminal is received on coming out of jail as if nothing had gone wrong. The Hawaiian is so impressionable that he could be easily led back to idolatry. Hawaiians are now on their trial as a civilized and Christian community, and how they will stand the test is hard to predict.

SUPERSTITION AMONG SAILORS.

As most people are well aware a seaman's life is anything but an apparently pleasant one, and has a peculiar monotony attached to it, calculated to inspire him with an extravagant amount of thought, bordering on the supernatural. The following narrative is penned, not for its authenticity, but simply to show to what a high degree of imagination sailors' minds in general attain.

It was some seven or eight years ago, whilst making the trip from Liverpool to San Francisco, on board of an English ship, we had just crossed the equator and entered the waters of the mighty Pacific. The sun had gone down and everything was still, save an occasional splash created by the motion of the vessel and the officer's martial tread, as he paraded the poop deck. The watch had just been relieved, and nothing being required of us, we congregated under the poop deck, which extended three or four feet forward from the cabin bulkhead, and began the invariable yarn a sailor delights in. After snuggling ourselves down, one of the oldest began the following:—

Well, boys, what I'm going to tell you now happened just as I'm going to relate it, and its solid truth. It was on board of the ship Hope. Perhaps some of you have seen or heard of her. Anyways I happened to be one of her crew when this experience befell her, and what's more, I was the principal party concerned.

It happened in the North Atlantic. We had just scudded clear of one of her famous bristers when the thing occurred. It was my turn at the wheel, and I had just spun her round once or twice and was steady-ly her on her course, when all at once, I was startled by the appearance of a delicate looking hand stretched across the face of the compass and the first finger pointing to east-north-east, and on one of the other fingers, a brilliant diamond ring was displayed. Boys, I just let go that wheel and dropped all of a heap on the deck. My hat, which had strings fastened under my chin to keep it from blowing off, just raised itself under the pressure of my hair, until I was nearly choked. Well, I cut it loose and got things shipshape, when I heard the skipper coming on deck to see what the noise was, he meant when I dumped myself. I told him as well as I could and pointed to the hand which was still visible and pointing in the same direction, namely: east-north-east. He looked and looked and told me I was dreaming. I politely begged to differ from him, and after a lot of questioning and a consultation with the chief officer, he decided to alter her course, which he did. We kept her east-north-east for a couple of days, and the skipper was just thinking about putting her back on her old course, when a vessel was reported in sight, and sure enough there she was. The captain saw through his telescope that she had distress signals flying, so we changed our course again and were soon alongside of her. She proved to be the French brig Ivanhoe, bound from Odessa to New York. Everything went well on board till they encountered a hurricane of great violence, which damaged her so that she became water-logged.

The captain and both officers were washed overboard and lost, the captain leaving behind his wife and two children, who were making the voyage with him. The poor woman went frantic with grief and fell into a swoon, which lasted until the time we secured her and the crew. After she recovered, which she quickly did under our care and treatment, we related the circumstances connected with the rescue of her and the crew, and my experience at the wheel. She showed us the diamond ring which I at once recognized, and frankly admitted that in her swoon she had recognized the appearance of our vessel, and described the appearance of the man at the wheel, which coincided with myself and the results already made known.

The Betrothal of Marie Louise.

On the 22nd of November, 1809, the Duc de Cadore, then Minister for Foreign Affairs at Paris, wrote to the Duc de Vicence, French Ambassador at St. Petersburg, to ask whether Napoleon's proposal for the hand of the Emperor Alexander's sister, the Grand Duchess Anne, would be favorably received. An immediate answer was required. At that date messengers took a fortnight to reach St. Petersburg from Paris; the answer to the dispatch of the 22d had not, consequently arrived when, on the 30th of November Napoleon's divorce was finally settled. On the 16th of December Josephine held her last reception at the Tuileries, which she was about to quit forever. While waiting for their carriages a remarkable conversation took place between M. de Semonville, who was then high in favor at court, and M. de Floret, one of the Secretaries of the Austrian Embassy, in which it transpired that the hand of the Archduchess Marie Louise would not be refused should Napoleon ask for it. This news was at once communicated to the Emperor and, as the answer from St. Petersburg was delayed, negotiations were broken off, and on the 7th of February, 1810, Prince Schwarzenberg signed the contract of marriage with the Archduchess Marie Louise at the Tuileries, and a messenger was at once dispatched to Vienna. Marie Louise consented with resignation rather than pleasure, and when Count Metternich, then Minister for Foreign Affairs, came to ask her consent, her first question was: "What does my father desire?" "The Emperor," answered Metternich, "has ordered me to ask your Imperial Highness' opinion with regard to an event upon which the future of his very existence depends; but do not ask what the Emperor wishes; tell me frankly what you wish yourself." "I only wish what my duty commands," answered Marie Louise. "When it is a question regarding the welfare of the Empire, you must consult that and not my will. Beg my father to obey his duty as a sovereign, without consideration for my personal feelings." When this answer was brought to the Emperor he showed no surprise, but said: "My consent to this marriage will at least secure a few years of peace and prosperity to my unhappy country, which I must employ in endeavoring to heal its wounds. I owe myself wholly to the welfare of my people, and therefore I must not hesitate."—[The National Review.

THE BRAZILIAN GIRL.

Girls are sometimes married so young in Brazil that they become mothers at twelve or thirteen years of age. A certain count was married to his cousin when neither had yet reached their teens, the little bride being only seven years of age when the ceremony was performed. This was done by the parents to insure their fortunes remaining in the family.

A girl is never permitted to go out, not even to church, unless chaperoned by one of the family, or some other lady, generally of mature age. Nothing could be more colorless than the life of a young Brazilian woman. She has no taste whatever for reading; her education is of the most meager description, it not being considered worth while to educate girls. The necessity for educating boys is understood by parents, and those who are able to do so, but a girl, what need has she for an education? They would laugh at such high-flown ideas should any one suggest that their daughters be given the benefits of an education as a resource at hand for their own amusement, or that they might be intelligent companions, capable of stimulating the intellects of their children, and husbands, too, for that matter.

A very large majority of the Brazilian girls could not tell who the Emperor of Germany, or that President Garfield and the Czar of Russia were assassinated; the Soudan or Gen. Gordon are riddles to their minds. They are even ignorant of some of the most important historical facts relating to their own land, and of the thousand and one other topics that the women of America and other countries are generally conversant with. They embroider, crochet and study music, but usually lack the patience and application necessary to excel in the latter. If they want a drink of water, or their shoes changed, they call a slave to do it. Many can sew, and do their own dressmaking, being very skillful with their needle, their natural antipathy to work being overcome by their love of dress. Their conversation is utterly frivolous, and when with families they talk very loud, and in the most animated manner, gesticulating and beating the air with their hands and arms, all talking at once, with seldom anything worth saying. If the Brazilian girl does not marry at the age when she ought to be playing with her dolls, she frequently continues to play with her dolls until she does marry. The writer remembers seeing a young lady about eighteen years of age in a street-car, in the city of Bahia, with a doll in her lap, which she cared for and handled the same as a little girl would do, and it is no unusual thing for young married women to own and play with these and similar fixtures of the nursery. One young woman, named Marie, had five or six dolls, upon whose garments she spent much of her time. When she married she insisted upon taking them to her new home, but when this home became invaded by less tractable babies, she was finally obliged to bury her inanimate, quondam friends, with all their finery, in a trunk, probably to be resurrected by other little Marias, when they will again be nursed and made confidants of.—[Farmers Home.
